The new game allowed players to create and play any kind of tactical unit in a 3D environment. It was praised for giving players the freedom to choose the way they played, as well as for its high replay value. In the 2005 issue of PC Gamer, a reader's game was chosen in which he commented that he would never dream that he could play "a simulation of an entire war". This game was the last instalment of the Panzer General series and was generally well received, as it was met with praise for it being a significant step in the series' development. Panzer General: The Fighting General was praised for being an immensely deep game, and gave players a chance to plan the battle out all the way down to the smallest detail, and control the resources of individual forces. It also gave them the freedom to play differently, for example, a player who had learned the best tactics for a given map could
