reminiscent quotes / K.K. Gülçin the 'young' me / Andrew Newey

PROLOGUE award winning young actor chris As a child growing up in the 1960s, on a diet of Doctor Who, Andy Pandy, Dick Barton and other 80s and early 90s nostalgia foodstuffs, I longed for the days when I'd be given a hand held to play with in the seat next to my desk. It was a time before iPads, digital iPods and gaming devices, and when you were an art student, you either owned an Amstrad, an Atari or a Beeb. So when my parents bought me my first computer – an Amstrad PCW with 4MB of RAM – I was overwhelmed by its advanced technology and the fact it was hooked up to a monitor that was the size of a small TV! By the time I got to college and I was studying computer science and game programming, there were still hand helds available, though the games were usually either obscure or rubbish (and, if you're on a diet of 80s and early 90s games, that's pretty much what you'll have to get used to). As I hit my mid twenties I developed a bit of a nostalgia trip and started to listen to a lot of Radio 4 and pretend I was a kid again. Then, one day, it suddenly dawned on me that I could carry on that old habit and see what else was in my collection. I started listening to a few stories and some things dawned on me. Not all of the stories were on Radio 4, in fact most of them weren't. I found myself listening to loads of old books, old theatre stories, old science fiction stories, old film, old comedy, old horror, old songs and more. I found myself listening to snippets of dialogue from old films and adverts. I discovered not only that I'd spent years watching television in that state of suspended disbelief, but also that I'd been reading about all those old things for years. I listened to lots of shows like this and when I found a show that I really enjoyed, I started to put together a playlist of stories I'd like to hear on that show. A few years later, I decided to share those stories with other people on the web. Now, I've always been a keen listener of podcasts and I've
