The first phase of the project, codenamed, Joint Strike Fighter Preliminary Design, is designed to develop, test and demonstrate the feasibility of the JSF through a single computer controlled flight test of a demonstrator aircraft. The demonstration was designed to test various flight characteristics of the aircraft, including its horizontal and vertical flight control surfaces, and to evaluate its lift and thrust characteristics. The project was conducted in 2004-2005. The project was overseen by the U.S. Government and was a joint project between the U.S. Navy, the U.S. Air Force, the U.S. Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA), and Boeing. It was a managed project of the U.S. Government's Advanced Concepts Team (ACT) that worked closely with the JSF programme office to improve the JSF system of systems. The project included systems and environmental simulation, avionics, electrical power generation and distribution, flight controls, control surfaces, drive system and mission systems. The long-term objectives of the demonstration project were to improve the operational capability of the system, which will require both in-service hardware and software upgrades as well as the addition of several new technologies. The first phase of the project was conducted by both Boeing and Lockheed Martin, which provided the structural and flight control systems, respectively.Q: How to get the active record values in Laravel (?)
