However, you get a notification that your users are now reporting some strange crashes. You check the logs, and you see that there's a crash that occurs randomly, and you're not sure how to troubleshoot it. There might be a bug in your code, or it could be something else. How do you start troubleshooting? The first step is to debug the app. You'll have to open the project in Xcode. Select the app from the device simulator. You'll see the console log from the device in the bottom half of the simulator window. Next, you need to make a few more changes to the app. To debug a crash in the app, you'll need to add some code that will cause the crash. As an example, you'll add a button that crashes the app. After the crash, take a look at the console log. You'll need to see the crash report that was generated by the app. Xcode provides more information in the app crash report. You'll see a stack trace and some other information that can help you solve the crash. If you need to debug a crash in the app, you can start by following these steps.Nosocomial Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia: a study of 516 cases in a neonatal intensive care unit. To review the incidence, clinical presentation, and management of nosocomial Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia (PCP) in a neonatal intensive care unit (NICU), the authors conducted a retrospective cohort study of the medical records of all neonates born at all births occurring at the study institution between 1 January 1985 and 31 December 1991. Of the 28,207 infants born during this period, 516 neonates (1.92/1000 admissions) were admitted to the NICU. Eighty-eight of these 516 neonates (17%) developed 2d92ce491b
