In Git, why does it mark directories that contain files? For example if I have a repository where I have test.txt in a directory named test and then I added the directory test (it's just test.txt inside of it), it would mark that directory as modified since it contains a file inside of it. How does Git mark directories? A: This has to do with Git's copy-tree operation, which copies a single file and all directories or sub-directories that contain it. If you have test.txt — test In the first step, git status will see that test.txt is in the test directory, so it determines that it should be marked modified and not staged for commit. In the second step, git status will see that test is in the working tree, so it determines that it should be marked modified and not staged for commit.
